■ Considering the scale of scolding

The student affairs director asked the teachers at a meeting the other day. Which of ① to ⑬ would you like to instruct the most strictly? For those of you reading this communication (including junior high school students), please think about this together. None of the 13 items should be overlooked. You should definitely call out to them (and be called out to them).

However, when asked to prioritize, such as "which one is the most important," opinions seems to vary considerably from second to third place. In some sense, this may be natural. It goes without saying that the way a person thinks and feels differ depending on their previous experiences.

■ Is there "something" that makes sense?

Junior high school students may have wondered, "When I am scolded, what is the most acceptable thing to do?" I think people grow when they realize something that they can agree with.

On the other hand, when you don't do that (I don't know why, but it's the rule, so if you don't do it, you'll be scolded), even if things go well, you won't have any power. In fact, you may learn to blame others when things go wrong.

■ That's why we talk.

Teachers at Higashi Junior High School often talk to each other. What do you really need to achieve our most important goal, "Work for the happiness of yourself and everyone else"? Therefore, in terms of the above items, ⑥. There is happiness only in having life. The next thing that cannot be overlooked is the behavior of trying to make oneself (ourselves) feel good by making others feel bad or causing trouble. We talk about it repeatedly and are very particular about something that we can agree on (I don't think there is any need to be particular about something that is nor clear). Wouldn't you like to gain strength in this way?
